○A necessary

콜론(:) 뒤가 빈칸의 내용을 설명한다.
아산화질소는 파괴될 때 산소를 '방출'하고, 메탄은 산소를 '소비'한다.
즉 산소에 대해 서로 반대 방향으로 작용 → 빈칸 = '반대의, 역의' 관계.
inverse(역의, 반대의)가 정확히 이 대조를 담는다.

But others have (ii) _____, noting that the herbivorous dinosaurs there would have needed an abundant food supply.

Blank (i)	Blank (ii)
attrition	abdicated
dearth	acceded
attenuation	demurred

해설

(i) 앞 문장: 공룡 화석은 많지만 식물 화석은 'few' → 식물의 '부족, 결핍'. dearth(부족)가 정답.

'leads some scientists to speculate … barren(불모의)'도 식물이 적다는 뜻과 연결된다.

(ii) But others … noting that 초식공룡에게는 풍부한 먹이가 필요했을 것 → 앞의 '불모지' 추측에 반대 의견을 낸 것.

빈칸 = '이의를 제기하다' → demurred.

정답: B (dearth), F (demurred)

attrition은 '점진적 감소/마모'라 식물이 '줄어든 과정'을 뜻하고, 단순히 '적다'는 상태와 다르다. acceded(동의하다)는 But 뒤 반론과 정반대.

A recent study shows that southern fulmars bring 40 percent more food to their chicks than do the closely related Antarctic petrels. Yet, fulmar chicks are only 10-20 percent heavier than petrel chicks. Hence, petrel chicks appear to be more efficient at converting their food into body mass. How can this be explained? First, while both species feed their chicks via regurgitation, petrels go on longer foraging trips. These trips may allow petrels to extract more water from the food or to partially digest their stomach contents, thereby creating more energy-rich meals. Thus, petrel chicks may receive more nutritious meals than fulmar chicks. Second, fulmar chicks are less well-insulated than are petrel chicks and may need to allocate a higher proportion of food energy to thermoregulation rather than growth.

○B Adult fulmars are less well-insulated than adult petrels.

○C Adult fulmars spend more time foraging than adult petrels.

In his essay "Classical Jazz and the Black Arts Movement," Lorenzo Thomas argues that the Black Arts movement of the 1960s grew out of the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s, during which African American artists produced work consciously grounded in their cultural heritage. Both movements hoped to advance African Americans' social position through cultural expression. Yet Black Arts movement scholar Larry Neal pronounced the Harlem Renaissance, which produced enduring works in many genres, "essentially a failure." According to Thomas, Neal's statement reflects a difference in the two movements' political and aesthetic philosophies. Whereas leaders of the Harlem Renaissance championed the cause of African Americans by demonstrating their achievements in "high art" as defined by European tradition, the Black Arts movement's leaders celebrated an African American aesthetic conceived as openly oppositional to that tradition. This is evident in the status held by jazz within the two movements. Commentators of the Harlem Renaissance cited, as evidence of the sophistication of jazz, the adaptation of jazz elements by European classical composers such as Antonin Dvorák. Some hoped that jazz musicians themselves would develop jazz into forms resembling European orchestral music. By contrast, asserts Thomas, Black Arts movement participants celebrated jazz as a musical form grounded in African Americans' historical experience that could not be evaluated using European aesthetic values.

In 1961, Julia Child published《Mastering the Art of French Cooking》, frequently described as revolutionary. According to legend, Child inspired Americans to exchange their bland cooking for French cuisine's rich flavors. Yet, Child's book was hardly singular among cookbooks. One publishing catalog lists almost as many books about French cooking in the decade before Child's book as in the decade after. While Child's book influenced a particular American cohort, its effect on the American publishing industry was minimal, a fact at odds with popular assumptions both about publishers and about Child's importance. We might expect Child's success to foster many imitations. Instead, American cookbooks pursued themes popular before Child's book was published, including a growing interest in the American cooking styles allegedly vanquished by Child.

Stylistic analysis of ancient works of visual art can help in determining their time and place of origin. It is therefore important to identify the elements that constitute style and their relative value for establishing relationships among artworks. Most helpful in this regard is Schapiro’s breakdown of style into the three properties of art: form elements, form relationships, and qualities (including overall expression). Particularly helpful is his distinction between the first two categories. Citing the wide distribution over time of pointed and rounded arches in architecture, for example, Schapiro points out that form elements alone are insufficient for characterizing a style: one must also look at the different ways that the elements are combined—the compositional pattern or syntax. He compares style directly to language as having a similar internal order and expressiveness; this order (or grammar) can distinguish one stylistic group from another. The way visual motifs are articulated and combined is crucial when dealing with themes that are shared by a number of different cultures contemporary with one another. As Winter has noted, subject matter or iconography then becomes much less important than style in determining the place of origin of a particular artwork.

Tropical forests typically have many more species of plants and animals than do temperate forests of comparable size. During the Ice Age, forests in temperate regions were destroyed, while those in the tropics were not. Accordingly, one proposed explanation of this difference in the number of species is that tropical forests typically had a much longer period than temperate forests in which different species could take hold.

The distinction between the nutritional quality and quantity of prey is one component of the hypotheses that attempt to explain the declining populations of Steller sea lions in the Gulf of Alaska beginning in the 1970s. One view holds that the quantity of prey available was high overall, but because of the species composition of available prey (primarily non-fatty fish of the gadid family), the diet was nutritionally inferior—the junk food hypothesis. An alternative view is that gadids are nutritionally adequate but were not available in sufficient numbers because of fishing or some other factor. In either case, juvenile sea lions would be affected more than mature individuals because of the younger animals' higher energy requirements and relative inexperience at foraging.

○C They have been steadily declining in quantity in the Gulf of Alaska since the 1970s.
