New underwater tunnel projects increasingly rely upon immersed tube technology, which involves digging a channel in the seabed and then sinking prefabricated tunnel sections into it. As well as being more resilient in earthquakes, immersed tubes are generally faster and less expensive to build than traditional bored tunnels. To begin with, problems with one section of tunnel won't necessarily delay the entire project, and because immersed tubes can have a rectangular cross-section, they are a more efficient shape than circular tunnels for side-by-side railway lines. And while bored tunnels are usually considered stable only if their depth under the seabed at least equals their diameter, immersed tubes can sit immediately under the seafloor, allowing shallower approach gradients.

French painter Édouard Manet's 1863 painting《Le Bain》sparked controversy in part for its depiction of figures in contemporary dress. Though as long ago as 1824 the novelist Stendhal had urged artists to depict "the men of today and not those who probably never existed," serious paintings of modern-day Parisians were still relatively rare; the foremost painter of Manet's era, Ernest Meissonier, was celebrated for his idyllic scenes of the past. Manet's teacher Thomas Couture had achieved renown for his historical tableau of Roman times,《The Romans of the Decadence》, and he required his students to copy the works of old masters. However, he also urged his students to take as the subjects of their own paintings contemporary sights such as workmen, public holidays, and examples of modern technology. Manet may have seemed an unlikely convert to the cause, with the inspiration for his early paintings coming mostly from old masters he had sketched in the Louvre and the Uffizi. Still, Manet had begun paying heed to the advice of his teacher with canvases such as《The Absinthe Drinker》(1858) and《The Old Musician》(1862). He continued this trend in《Le Bain》, even if he appropriated his figures' poses directly from a 1518 Raphael drawing.

More than two decades after the death of George Balanchine, the choreographer's legacy is strangely unclear. In part this is because ballet has shallow roots in American culture. When Balanchine arrived in the United States in 1933, American ballet was little more than a vaudeville act. During the next 50 years, he raised American ballet to an internationally recognized art, producing an impressive body of great ballets and laying a foundation for generations to come—or so it was thought at the time of his death. But dance has no written tradition and disappears easily from collective memory: unless Balanchine's dances are alive and interesting now, we are likely to forget why they ever seemed so important.

As they unearth long-ignored women's writings, some feminist literary scholars have a tendency to evaluate those writings according to current ideological standards. This tendency, however understandable, has certain pitfalls, as feminist response to three late-seventeenth- and early-eighteenth-century English female playwrights demonstrates. Mary Pix, Catharine Trotter, and Delarivier Manley each wrote at least four plays and were known collectively as the "Female Wits." These women saw themselves as participating in a common endeavor, but feminist scholars have evaluated their works in very different terms. Trotter and Manley have been praised for their depiction of "feminist" themes—Trotter because of her insistence on feminine virtue, and Manley because of her depiction of strong, if sometimes villainous, heroines—while Pix's works, because they depict women in ways now considered stereotypically "feminine," are often dismissed.

Yet Pix is conservative only within a present-day context: within the context of late-seventeenth- and early-eighteenth-century English drama, Pix's plays were more formally innovative than Manley's and more successful than either Manley's or Trotter's. She also broke new ground regarding subject matter, addressing contemporary social issues such as class upheaval. However, these acts are rarely acknowledged by scholars of the Female Wits.

After Henry IV usurped the English throne from Richard II in 1399, evidence suggests the new king censored records that portrayed the new regime unfavorably. While no censorship orders are preserved, one chronicler mentions that Henry ordered all chronicles inspected. That not a single English chronicle is critical of the coup is a pretty good indication that Henry suppressed any hostile material. Moreover, the single voice with which the English chronicles praise Henry and defame Richard after 1399 is challenged by the contrary version of events recorded in the French chronicles. For most of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, this discrepancy was attributed to French Anglophobia, but the accuracy and value of the French chronicles has now been reappraised.

It can be inferred from the passage that many historians in the nineteenth century believed that the French chroniclers

○A overly praised Richard II during his reign

○B were less meticulous than their English counterparts

○C distorted their accounts of the events of 1399 because of antipathy toward England

○D refused requests by those in power to have their chronicles inspected

○E willfully ignored events in England in favor of recording happenings closer to home

해설

근거: 'For most of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, this discrepancy was attributed to French Anglophobia'.

Anglophobia(영국 혐오) = antipathy toward England. 즉 19세기 역사가들은 프랑스 연대기가 영국에 대한 반감 때문에 1399년 사건을 왜곡했다고 봤다.

정답: C

⚠ 함정 / 오답 포인트

B: '덜 꼼꼼했다'는 정확성 문제이지만, 지문은 원인을 '반감(Anglophobia)'으로 명시한다.

단어

usurped 찬탈하다 · usurp 찬탈하다 · Anglophobia 영국 혐오 · antipathy 반감 · discrepancy 불일치 · reappraise 재평가하다

Consider each of the choices separately and select all that apply.

The passage mentions which of the following as evidence suggesting censorship on the part of Henry IV?

- ☐ A Henry's request to inspect the chronicles
- ☐ B The uniformity of those chronicles' criticism of Henry's predecessor
- ☐ C The disparity between accounts offered in English and French chronicles

해설

A: 'one chronicler mentions that Henry ordered all chronicles inspected' → 검열의 증거.

B: 'the single voice with which the English chronicles praise Henry and defame Richard' + 비판적 연대기가 하나도 없음 → 획일성 = 증거.

C: 'Moreover… is challenged by the contrary version of events recorded in the French chronicles' → Moreover로 추가 증거 제시.

정답: A, B, C

⚠ 함정 / 오답 포인트

C를 빼기 쉽다: 불일치가 과거에 Anglophobia로 설명됐다는 점 때문에 증거가 아닌 것처럼 보이지만, Moreover로 추가 근거로 제시되고 프랑스 연대기는 재평가되었다.

단어
