As the United States shifted from an agricultural, production-oriented economy to an urban, bureaucratized, consumer-oriented economy, children were removed from the labor force and valued for sentimental rather than instrumental reasons. Children were increasingly studied, regulated, and protected through the rise of pediatrics, child psychology, child-welfare agencies, compulsory schooling, child-study programs, and so-called scientific parenting regimes. These changes shifted public attention away from the child considered to be in need of saving and toward the kind of child whose development would preoccupy parents, and whom advertisers would showcase—and eventually appeal to directly—in their promotion of goods. The redefinition of childhood served not to separate children from the commercial realm, but, rather, to advance the commoditization of childhood and the broader transformation to a consumer economy.

Aristotle (384–322 BC) was admired in the ancient world for the clarity of his style. Unfortunately, the writings that earned him this esteem have not survived. What we read today are not the books Aristotle prepared for publication, but lecture notes compiled for his own use. These have one great advantage: making no concessions to a lay readership, the Aristotelian works available to us are the ones that intellectually sophisticated commentators in late antiquity (AD 300–600) found philosophically most rewarding. But they also have disadvantages. These texts were not designed for public consumption and are consequently often difficult to understand. The process by which they took their present form is unclear: in some cases, there are signs of editorial activity either by Aristotle or by a later hand, so different versions of the same text may have been spliced together. In general, their style is cryptic, condensed, and allusive; the《Poetics》, in particular, is frequently very obscure. This obscurity has created difficulties for later readers of Aristotle. The《Poetics》, though not widely known in antiquity, became extraordinarily influential beginning around 1500 in the Renaissance, especially among literary critics. Yet the text's obscurities have left it open to conflicting interpretations. There are still fundamental disagreements about the meaning even of key concepts, such as katharsis.

Recent studies of the gender gap in the history of United States policies tend to focus on candidate choice rather than on registration and turnout. This shift in focus from gender inequality in political participation may be due to the finding in several studies of voting behavior in the United States that since 1980, differences in rates of registration and voting between men and women are not statistically significant after controlling for traditional predictors of participation. However, Fullerton and Stern argue that researchers have overlooked the substantial gender gap in registration and voting in the South. While the gender gap in participation virtually disappeared outside the South by the 1950s, substantial gender differences persisted in the South throughout the 1950s and 1960s, only beginning to decline in 1970s.

Domesticated crops have long been observed to differ strongly from their wild progenitors in morphological traits (form and structure). The enlargement of specific plant structures is the most widely emphasized of all of the changes that arise from domestication. Striking examples of gigantism can be found by comparing crops such as tomato (Lycopersicon esculentum), maize (Zea mays), beans (Phaseolus vulgaris), artichokes (Cynara cardunculus var. scolymus), sunflower (Helianthus annuus), and squash (Cucurbita pepo) with their wild ancestors.

The plant vigor hypothesis proposed by Price predicts that insect herbivores will tend to oviposit (lay eggs) on plant organs that grow faster and larger. Researchers found some support for this idea. For instance, in domesticated sunflowers, increased flower size from domestication is positively correlated with landing and egg-laying effort of female sunflower moths, Homoeosoma electellum, but increased seed size is negatively associated with parasitoid accessibility to H. electellum larvae. As a result, selection for gigantism may interfere with natural control and explain the observation that H. electellum is parasitized less frequently in sunflower agroecosystems than in natural sunflower ecosystems. However, parasitoids have a slightly greater effect on the banded sunflower moth, Cochylis hospes, which has a life history similar to that of H. electellum. Therefore, the life history of natural enemies and herbivores may influence whether selection for gigantism could result in enemy-free space for herbivores.

The primary purpose of the passage is to

○A suggest that growers' selection for gigantism in plants may have certain unexpected long-term benefits

○B account for a previously overlooked correlation between insectivore egg-laying on flowers and flower size

○C examine some findings regarding the effects of domestication on sunflowers' interactions with insect herbivores

○D challenge the idea that domestication of certain crops may contribute to changes in species that depend on those crops

○E consider whether the plant vigor hypothesis might explain recent research findings concerning the parasitization of certain herbivorous moths

1단락: 작물화로 인한 거대화(gigantism).
2단락: plant vigor hypothesis → 재배 해바라기의 꽃 크기 증가와 나방 산란, 종자 크기와 기생자 접근성, 두 나방 종 비교 → 작물화가 해바라기-초식곤충 상호작용에 미치는 영향에 대한 연구 결과 검토.
C 'examine some findings regarding the effects of domestication on sunflowers' interactions with insect herbivores'가 정확.
정답: C

⚠ 함정 / 오답 포인트
E는 plant vigor hypothesis가 '기생 현상'을 설명하는지를 따지는 것이라 범위가 어긋남(가설은 산란 위치에 관한 것). D는 저자 입장과 반대.

단어
sunflower moths 해바라기 나방 = 초식곤충 · parasitoid 포식기생자 · progenitor 조상, 원종 · oviposit 산란하다 · gigantism 거대화

The author mentions "maize (Zea mays)" primarily in order to

○A acknowledge that domesticated crops with certain features in common likely originated in similar ecosystems

○B emphasize that domestication of wild plants has resulted in a wide range of now-common food crops

○C cite a species that differs from its wild progenitor in the size of some of its plant structures

○D illustrate a claim about the reason that certain plant species have been favored for domestication

○E provide evidence that certain traits shared by many domesticated plants are advantageous

해설
문맥: 'Striking examples of gigantism can be found by comparing crops such as tomato, maize ... with their wild ancestors.'
maize는 거대화(특정 구조의 확대)의 예시 → 야생 조상과 일부 식물 구조의 크기가 다른 종.

The passage suggests which of the following about organisms that parasitize the larvae of H. electelhum?

○A They tend to be more successful in habitats with natural sunflowers than in those with domesticated sunflowers.

○B They have been observed to reproduce most prolifically in ecosystems where sunflowers have relatively large seeds.

○C They appear to interfere with H. electellum egg-laying effort on domesticated sunflowers but not on natural sunflowers.

○D They create a problem for growers of domesticated sunflowers for which innovative solutions are being sought.

○E They have been found to be more diverse in areas where Cochylis hospes are more numerous than H. electellum.

해설
근거: 'increased seed size is negatively associated with parasitoid accessibility to H. electellum larvae' → 재배 해바라기에서는 기생자가 유충에 접근하기 어려움.
그래서 'H. electellum is parasitized less frequently in sunflower agroecosystems than in natural sunflower ecosystems.'
→ 기생자는 자연 해바라기 서식지에서 더 성공적 = A.

Amatrox is a highly infectious disease common in the tropics. When people suffering from amatrox are given the drug vericol, their symptoms cease and the amatrox virus can no longer be detected. When treatment with vericol is discontinued, however, amatrox symptoms sometimes return within a few months and the virus is again detectable. Therefore, although treatment with vericol suppresses the amatrox virus below detectable levels, it does not always eliminate the virus entirely from the body.

This passage is adapted from material published in 2007.

Wilson has suggested that the methodological orientations of the political science discipline might account for political science's lagging behind history and sociology in the publication of mainstream journal articles on African American topics. He explained these relative disciplinary differences regarding publication as partially resulting from pressure to do large-scale voter studies; this pressure placed those interested in African American politics at a disadvantage, because the relevant empirical data on the Black population were insufficient to render findings that were externally valid and generalizable. Wilson's second explanation pointed to the discipline's traditional focus on politics and decision-making processes at levels to which African Americans have historically had limited access—a narrow focus reflected in the types of research articles favored in mainstream political science journals.

Which of the following can be inferred from the passage about "large-scale voter studies"?

○A They are not well suited for drawing conclusions about certain population groups.

○B They are insufficiently concerned with producing valid and generalizable results.

○C They have helped give rise to political science's focus on decision-making in a narrow range of contexts.

○D They remain unappealing to mainstream journals.

○E They are becoming less popular among political scientists.
